Wolf Run Cabin Rebuilt in White Mountain National Recreation Area

FAIRBANKS, AK – The Bureau of Land Management has rebuilt the popular Wolf Run public recreation cabin in the White Mountains National Recreation Area.

The original Wolf Run cabin was destroyed by a wildfire in 2005, one year after a wildfire destroyed the Crowberry Cabin, also in the White Mountains. BLM recreation staff from the Eastern Interior Field Office decided to replace the Wolf Run cabin first because of its critical location on one of the White Mountains' popular winter trails. BLM anticipates rebuilding Crowberry Cabin this fall.

BLM staff used a helicopter to transport logs, other building materials, a generator and a woodstove to the Wolf Run building site in early June. Between June 14 and June 20, a crew of six BLM employees rebuilt the cabin and installed the woodstove.

The new Wolf Run cabin is larger than the original at 12 feet by 16 feet (the original cabin was approximately 10 feet by 12 feet). It offers a picture window with a good view of the Limestone Jags, a local geologic feature.
